little model I am showing is stable to many materials. At the ity striped silk. These are spular this season, and we leed be thankful that the ugly med old-time foulard is not attention. Dark blue with a color stripe, or a green stripe black or white stripe, would serve rectical color combination goo g cool days and wear at the bead or in the mountains. The waist an leeves are in one, the latter being gathered slightly into a narrow band of silk to match the color of the stripe in the material.

This same silk is used in an interesting manner to trim the waist. From the pointed neck in front it starts back in collar effect, continuing down the back as a panel which is caught into the belt. Accentuating the neck opening in front are small buttons of the colored silk which appear from under the collar. This waist is surely simple with no modish escentricities but combined with the skirt and sash aids in a distinctive ensemble.

skirt and sash aids in a distinctive ensemble.

The modish long tunic is used on the skirt, it being cut from two straight widths of the material, but the yoke from which it is suspended is of the plain silk. This affords a delightful variation, together with the sash whose bunched knot and ends dropping in back affect the modish silhouette.

For cotton materials such as volle. French crepe, lawn or batiste, the association of lace as shown at the left is pretty. The collar of it dropping softly down the back as a panel may be loose or attached to the waist as desired. Edging it may be a cording of colored satin, matching that in the figure of the material, or if of plain material, a color harmonizing with it may be used. Satin covered buttons would be a dainty ornamental touch in front, and satin cuffs would combine well as the sleeve finishing. However, lace cuffs or cuffs of the frock material may be used if launcering is to be considered.

The dainty lace is not omitted from the skirt, being used as the short yoke from which the main skirt and tunic portions are attached. In the back, however, it is almost concealed by the quaint sash arrangement.

Of pale colored batiste, such as watermelon pink, maise or orchid, this little frock would be very effective. And it should be noted that the sash is of the frock material, a
